primer lesson in an analysis of Germany's policies.

The state department knows well enough that Germany has tried unsuccessfully endless moves to make peace a decoy—to create a morbid appetite among the peoples who have been trying to make democracy safe—an appetite for rest, for an end of privation, loss suffering, for relief from stress, for a temporary comfert bought at the price of principle of the sensational.

Elaborate Methods.

Some day there will be expessed, in ters the subconscious mind like a all its extent, the systematic, clabo-slow disease draining off fighting rate methods which Germany has spirit, manhood and the dash and used in an endeavor to poison the spirit, manhood and the dash and power of the one purpose, and beats upon that which should be the unbreakable will of the people who must win.

For America, this question baunting the milids of its citizens is more dangerous than it was "over there," Our soft prosperity, our distance from the struggle, tempts weak men to cling to the comforts of peace. We have not felt the gaff of war, Not yet

Our soft presperity, our distance from the struggle, tempts weak men to cling to the comforts of peace. We have not felt the gaff of war. Not yet have we learned the pain of that full deep thrust of regret that when democracy called for us we, the pioneers of liberty, asked why and how and when—but, at first, did not come. We have not learned even the prejude of that day when war will have selzed and wrung our hearts, when the ghosts of our men come back to sit in the farmhouse kitchen or in the leather chairs of the club, to click the latches of village gates, and march in invisible brigades up the asphalted avenues.

"No."

"No."

"No."

"No."

"No. I. When they ask me when the war will end, I say, "Something like a year or two after the Prussians think it is time to stop."

For a conteat between two men, two football teams, two nations, or two great alliances struggling in the greatest war of all, over the greatest issue of all, there can be no other doctrine. When John Paul Jones's antagonists asked him if he was sweed that he had not begun to fight it was not John Paul Jones's his enemy who was kicked. For it was his enemy who was kicked. For it was his enemy who was wondering "when it would be over."
